Chapter 1 by t brown

I share with you my trials and travails as a ghost not to gain pity. My hope is to inspire others of similar disposition . I also wish to display the very likely circumstance that one should never fail to question the stereotypes that put your fellow into an unmerited position of fighting ghosts. Well i graduated from my correspondence course with a respectable show of my diligence. The Wexely school for boys sent me my certificate of completion and academic satisfaction in the field of cobblestone repair. I soon realized to my dismay that cobblestones were quite out of fashion and I determined my prospects to be less than ideal.

I could but sit and moan in the drafty holes which riddled my home. I naturally found it quite a bargain when i was first to place my fancy upon it and the price was more than affordable it was free.It was during such a session of self sympathetic cacophony that i was penetrated by a stone and noticed i was not alone.

My intrest in ghostly activity such as scaring the bejesus out of intruders was very dampened by my gloom,I simply sighed and continued to moan.I was startled when the sound of another moaning voice joined mine. I looked about and noted a small boy not but a foot away crooning with me.

I waited a moment and moaned again .I noticed he looked right at me and smiled before he moaned along with me.An infectious smile i found myself smiling as well.Soon we both began to laugh together. Noone has ever seen me and I was not sure he could until he sat right beside me and asked 'What has you so blue there fellow' 'You can see me then?"

he chuckled"I can hear you right enough you are a loud one!"I grinned "thank you for that but you see I am moaning because---"and I began to relate what you reader already know of the situation.
